Illos qui nullum omnino Deum esse dixerunt, non modo non philosophos, sed ne homines quidem fuisse dixerunt.
LACTANT.

I Have always thought, that NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, is not only the most agreeable amusement, but the most useful study to rational beings, who cannot employ their faculties better, than in contemplating the works of an omnipotent and gracious God, whose infinite wisdom is displayed, in every object which presents itself to those who are capable of thought. It is true indeed, that we view the more magnificent parts of nature with some delight, but treat with contempt her smaller productions, tho' all of them discover no less their Divine Original. For an example, let us chuse a common fly, and compare it with the most exquisite works of art, what beauty and gilding appears in as plugage! elegance in the structure of its several parts! and what a conformity in the whole! for the preservation of one single insignificant insect! the very formation of its eyes exceeds all conception, for they consist of no fewer than 8000 distinct Lenses, each of which is furnished with a branch from the optic nerve, to enable it to see every way at once: How sagacious must the Author of this little creature have been, to lodge so many senses in so small a compass! How did he find room to fix so many eyes, and range them in the most elegant order, as it were on a single point? Where to insert the several organs of hearing, smelling, tasting and feeling? And yet, there are many tribes so infinitely smaller than this, that 40,000 of them, can swim freely in a quantity of water no larger than a grain of millet seed, and all as perfect in their kind. Those are the objects that will bear a scrutiny, from the best eye, assisted with the best glass, whilst the most curious works of art cannot be viewed with pleasure; for, the point of the smallest and best polished needle, looks like a plough-share, the side of the keenest razor, like a furrowed field, and the finest lawn like a mat made of thick ropes; so vast a difference is there betwixt the works of Nature and art.

If the skill of the Workman, is so much displayed in the structure of one single insect, how much greater knowledge did it require, to create a whole world out of nothing! To cover it with verdure, and stock every part of it with inhabitants! There not being a tree, plant, flower, or puddle of water, but swarms with life; to which should we add, the innumerable variety that traverse the great deep, and the infinite swarms which fly invisibly to us in the air, how are we lost in wonder! But, his wisdom is not more conspicious in creating such numbers of animals, than in adapting their natures to the several places and elements in which they are found, which we see constantly to hold true.

Another instance of Divine Management, is the order, in which the several tribes of animals appear, which happens always at those seasons, in which every thing necessary for their support is in perfection: Thus we see all nature teeming in the spring, wild beasts bring forth, reptiles creep out of their winter retreats, and the several broods of insects hatch, at the time that grass grows, and trees and plants bud and flower for their subsistence, which continue their verdure so long as is necessary; the lives, of by far the greatest number, ending with the summer: But before this fatal period, what care is taken by the parent animals, for securing their future offspring, by depositing their eggs in such concealed and proper places, as they seldom miscarry in, and find a ready supply of nourishment as soon as they are hatched. Thus some seal up their eggs in houses of clay, inclosing with them a sufficient supply of food for their young, until they are strong enough to gnaw their way out and shift for themselves; others place their sperm in wood, others on this or that plant, fruit or tree; some on the hair of beasts, others on the scales of fishes; those whose food lies in water, always in water; so that, whatever methods they take in this respect, are found to be the very best that could be thought of, by the most sagacious beings, for the preservation of their species. No less an amazing argument of the goodness of God appears, in his ordering things so, that amongst such an infinite variety of animals, each species should crave but one sort of food, by which wise provision, every different appetite is plentifully supplied, and after their necessities are served, nothing remains to prove an incumbrance.

But, to prevent an accident of this sort, (which must sometimes happen, if chance had any share in the works of nature) it was necessary to adjust the number of animals, it being very plain, that the surface of our globe, can only afford materials a certain proportion with shelter and food; for, should any one Genus double or treble their numbers, many must starve or devour one another. Wherefore, the wise Author of their Being, hath determined the life of all creatures to a certain period, in proportion to which is their increase; for the shorter lived animals, and such as are most useful, are very prolific, but those which live long, have a small increase, by which means a proper ballance is kept up, and the world is neither in danger of wanting inhabitants, nor of being over-stocked.

Notwithstanding this variety in the animated creation were we to view Nature through her several works, we should find, that she has not proceeded by large steps and hasty strides: There is no blank, nor chasm, in all that she has done, but, the whole is a compleat chain, one Being rising gradually over another, by an easy progression; the mineral kingdom being linked with the vegetable; the vegetable with the animal; one animal with another; the beasts on the land with the beasts and fishes in the sea; birds with both; and reptiles and insects with all, so that the whole forms a noble Climax, which I doubt not might be traced from inert matter even to man.

The asbestos seems to be the link in this chain, which connects minerals with vegetables; and these are plants which shew a greater sensibility than some animals, which adhere firmly to that point which they at first happened to light on, and as irrecoverably die, if removed from it, as a plant does, when plucked up by the roots. Of the sensibility of plants we have instances of several degrees of it, among those called sensitive, but the animal-flower lately discovered at Barbadoes, makes the connection stronger, for this which was thought to be a sub-aquatic-flower, proves a living creature, tho' furnished with fewer vital organic parts, than others which enjoy a more active life. We do not find all animals which are peculiar to each element, confined to either at once, but, sinking as it were, into each other by slow degrees, through several intermediate Genera; gradually losing those organs, which fitted them for both, 'till at last, they become qualified for one only.—It would be too prolix as well as needless, to give instances of the amphibious beasts, birds, reptiles and insects, every one's memory being ready, to furnish him with evidences of this sort. However, as it may be necessary to give some examples to confirm what is said above, the sea furnishes us with fish (a) which have wings and fly, fowls which have no wings but swim above or under water like a fish (b), quadrupedes and bipides that walk on the bottom of the sea (c), some land birds have no wings and are covered rather with a coarse shaggy hair than with feathers (d), others cannot fly but burrough under ground like a beast (e); there are besides, some quadrupedes that fly (f): The several species of animals, peculiar to either element, pass through the same easy scale, for we do not see that one species differs so specifically from those which are immediately above or below it, as to have nothing in common with either. I shall but just mention, that nature proceeds more slowly, in the formation of such creatures as but faintly resemble man, for on some she only bestows a thumb, (g) on others few or more fingers, some again have hands, and and others both beaſts and fowls, which they uſe as meat cloaths, beds, and other particulars which might make the comparison stronger. There is however this difference, amongſt other things, that no art can make them ſpeak, which even mute brutes do only imagine by imitation, for had he not enjoyed the benefit of ſociety, he would only have been able more expertly to imitate the voices of beaſts.
